Editors Appeal; There can be not upropriety in calmiy discussing the questions which enter into the prices, quantities and manner of preparation of the great staple which gives life and motion to all our wants, interests and necessities; and any suggestions—no matter from what source—that may tend to throw a safe-guard about the operations of even a sin-gle planter or merchant, will, it is be-lieved, not have been offered in vain. One of the chief difficulties with many persons in the past, has been a too ready disposi-tion to credit all theories looking to increased prices. It seems to have been, and now to be, the tendency of the ma-jority of planters aspecially, to magnify into undue importance every little local circumstance looking to inflated prices; and almost all of them are in the bath, of estimating a decreased general produc-tion by the unfavorable local conditions that may happen to characterize the cotton of their respective neighborhoods. And this mode of calculation does not, with them, as one might naturally appose, necessarily apply to the same reserved principle. For if it did, it is believed that many of the planters woes would be remedied. If instead of, as is usual, ex-aggerating the expected price of a growing bale of cotton, each planter would have his calculations upon some safe assumption certainly inside the limit of a fair average price, there could scarrely be any probability of trouble between his debit and credit accounts at the close or his cotton season. But it is too well known by all who may read this article, that such is not usually the case. On the contrary, most planters (we are glad to record wise exceptions) on account pos-

record wise exceptions) on account pos-sibly of sanguine temperaments, or more probably of some strange and unaccount-able fascinations which a large bale of beautiful "Middling" seems always sure to create in the enthusiastic producer, are sure to make their purchases and create their obligations upon this rese-water theory, only to find at the day for settlement the whole fatric of their exiculations demolished by the hard and unhappy fact of unrealized expectations, and the planter is not always alone to and the planter is not a ways stone to to be numbered among our wisest and

We have only to look a few months behind to see how fatal has keen the policy of holding for higher prices. Suppose, you who have soid within the last few days your middling cotton at 18 cents, that you had taken the offer of 22 cents made you four months ago, would you not feel much richer with the twentywas expected to pay? All these are pertiant inquiries, although they must grapple with facts. Let them, in conclusion—the with facts. Let them, in conclusion—the control of growing and control of growing an ever, that, speaking from his city throne of superior light and hytelligence, and attending to the "ups and downs" of the markets, he does not undersate the extent of information, and intelligence of the planting concennity as to its own specialty. The planter has abundant time for reflection on the particular avo-cation in which he is engaged; and why some and self cotton for what it will bring, should light per its better than the may be somewhat difficult of explanation. Indicat, following Mr. Moore's action and selfice exists as it can be picked out, calls for no intelligence and selfice exists for no intelligence and no thought whatseever. In that case it is not necessary to get the factor to do his thinking, and a fool will do about as well for a factor as the weest man. Barang all distonests, which is continued to cient certainty of the means of being punctual, and the influence of having een accustomed to long credits, we think to main cause of difference of opinion the main cause of difference of opinion between the planters and merchants is a conflict of interest—one wishes to "realize," at prices high or low, and the other to withhold sales at low prices. Merchants want their commissions for image dilate operations, planters their proceeds only for another crop. One is gready for fresh profits; the other, knowing his estimated in the profits; the other, knowing his estimated in the profits; the other, knowing his estimated in the profits; the other with it, is often unwisely deliberate, and willing to make haste slowly. With all this, the result has nothing to do; and, as it takes a profligiously wise man, or a this, the result has nothing to do; and, as it takes a proligiously wise man, or a wonderful fool, to tell the price of cotton ten days ahead, we think it is hardly worth while for either party to enter the lists. Probably Mr. M.'s advice may do pretty well to follow, in the absence of better; and remembering always that the crop of Mississippi, all lost, would take away hardly one-twentieth of the crop of the world, and that the Memphis market is slightly affected by that of idverpool, we are not inclined to dispute, however, that "pay as you go" is a good motio. To plant corn for allving, and cotton for pin-money, is another just as good.
